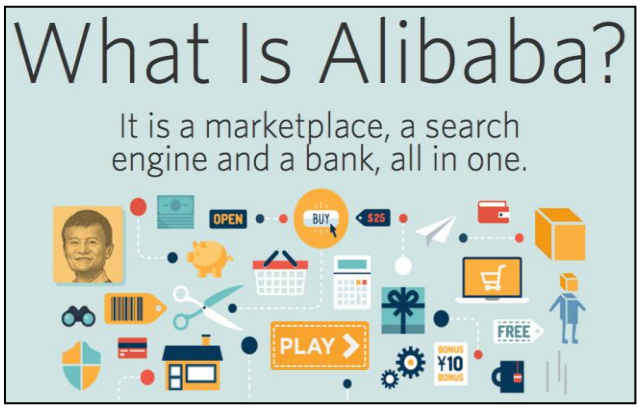
[1] Jack Ma was born in 1964, in Hangzhou, China. He grew up in a poor family. Following a former US president's visit to Hangzhou in 1972, Jack Ma's hometown became a tourist destination, and Jack Ma decided to take advantage of the situation. He started waking up early to go to the city's main hotel. He offered American visitors tours of the city in exchange for English lessons. The nickname "Jack" was given to him by a tourist he befriended.



[2] The only way Jack Ma could succeed was through education. After high school, he failed the entrance exam to college twice. However, he finally passed on the third time. When he graduated in 1988, he applied for many jobs. He was turned down many times including a Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurant. Finally, he worked as an English teacher, earning as little as $12 a month.

[3] A few years later, Jack Ma set up a translation business and in 1995 he went to the US to speak English for a Chinese company. There, he was introduced to the internet for the first time in his life. He realized that Americans knew very little about Chinese products. Then, he decided to set up an internet company connecting small businesses in China to international customers.

[4] With some of his friends, he created an online marketplace which they called Alibaba. The website allowed Chinese manufacturers to post lists of products that clients could buy directly. Soon, the service started to attract members from all over the world. Jack Ma was able to connect small businesses together and with the rest of the world.

[5] Today, Alibaba Company hires 24,000 workers and sells goods and services to many parts of the world. It makes an annual revenue of $5.55 billion. As a result, Jack Ma has become one of the wealthiest people in the world with an estimated fortune of $ 25 billion.
